Peace for the Dead, or kispu(m) Again

Akio TSUKIMOTO*

New references to ki.si.ga-kispu(m) “care of the dead” are increasing constantly. Examining them respectively, we come to know some aspects of the Mesopotamian practice of caring of the dead including isin abim “an ancestral festival.”

Keywords: kispu, isin abim, family spirit, kispu ginû, bit kimti

I. kispu(m) as “Care of the Dead”

Since my dissertation “Untersuchungen zur Totenpflege (kispu(m))) im alten Mesopotamien” was submitted in 1980 (published in the series of AOAT in 1985), a good number of new textual materials for kispu(m) (ki.si.ga in Sumerogram) have appeared. In this short paper I would like to review them.

The Akkadian term kispu(m) was and still is widely translated to “funerary offerings” in English, “offrandes funéraires” in French, and “Totenopfer” in German. I used “Totenpflege” for kispu(m) in my above-mentioned study, for kispu(m) has a connotation of care (Pflege) of the dead in most cases. The meaning of “funerary offerings / offrandes funéraires” may also be too restricted, because the dead person was served with kispu(m)-offerings not only on the occasion of his funeral ceremony, but also regularly thereafter, at least once a month. Here, I use “care of the dead” for kispu(m) in principle.

II. ki.si.ga and ki.a.nag

It goes without saying that the tradition of “care of the dead” goes back to the third millennium BCE. The Sumerian term ki.si.ga, however, is so far not attested in Sumerian texts of the third millennium. The Sumerians used instead ki.a.nagu, a term that indicates a place for pouring water and giving offerings to the deceased. It is not easy, however, to comprehend the cult of the dead in the third millennium, not because the textual evidences are scanty, but, on the contrary, because they show rather diversity with respect to the occasion as well as the date of the cult. Ur-Namma, the founder of the Ur III dynasty, for example, was given daily offerings at ki.a.nag, whereas ki.a.nag was not referred... to in the case of daily offerings for other dead kings of the same dynasty. According to W. Sallaberger, offerings to the dead kings at ki.a.nag were given in the course of the Ninazu festival in the 6th month and also at the abum-festival in Ur, whereas in Nippur the cult for the dead kings was connected with ab.ē-festival in the 10th month. Sallaberger also points out that nig.dab₃ ki.a.nag “the delivery of offerings at / for the water drinking place” was succeeded to the Larsa dynasty of the Old Babylonian period and the term ki.a.nag was replaced by ki.si.ga in one of the offering lists. In any case, the dead kings of the Ur III dynasty received additional offerings on the full and new moon day, which corresponds to the ancestral worship in Old Babylonian Mari.

III. ki.si.ga in the Sumerian Literature
Regarding ki.si.ga in the Sumerian literary tradition, we now have two texts of great importance. One is an incantation to Utu edited anew by B. Alster in ASJ 13. The oldest tablet (source A) of the text belongs to the Old Babylonian period. The main purpose of the incantation is to soothe the angry spirits of the dead which cause the living trouble, with help of Utu, the judge of the netherworld. In ll. 117-169 the text indicates how to treat the spirit in individual cases. In this context ki.si.ga is mentioned.

The first passage concerns the spirit of a dead family member: “If it is a family spirit (gidim im.ri.a)….., on the day of the lot of mankind, the death of his personal god, the ritual ceremony (garza/gārza) is carried out for him at his grave, on the day of the new moon, the evil day,….. bread for care of the dead is laid for him (ninda ki.si.ga mu.na.ni.gar).” The family spirit in a collective sense, as far as it is respectfully kept in the regular care after burial, was believed to have power to control evil demons in the netherworld and protect its descendents from them. This is the reason why bread of ki.si.ga is laid for the family spirit in the text. The text also suggests that the ritual ceremony for the family spirit is carried out at the grave on the new moon day. In the Old Babylonian period people usually practiced care of the dead on the new moon day, once a month, in Babylonia and on the day of the new moon and the full moon, twice in a month, in Mari. Although Old Babylonian text materials, as far as I know, do not mention a grave definitely as place for food offerings for the deceased, we can assume that care of the dead was also practiced at the grave in the Old Babylonian time, as is the case in the first millennium.

The second passage is dealing with the dead person who, because of his anger (šā zu.kēš.da.ni), causes curses to his heir (ibila.ni.ra nig.gig in.ak.e) and whose anger must be released by means of food offerings (a text variant in parentheses): “

Let the dead man eat food in his house, let him drink water of his house.

Let him sleep in the shade of his house (/May you sleep in your house).

Let his heir live. Let him pour ……(/Your son has weighed silver. Let him pour water for him).

Let him place food for care of the dead for himself (ú ki.si.ga [h]é.en.na.gá.gá).

Let him pour water for care of the dead for himself (a ki.si.ga hé.en.na.de.e).”

It is “in his house” that the heir is directed to give food offerings for his deceased father, so that the latter may “sleep in the shade of his house.” The “house” here seems to refer to the grave at which food offerings were put for him (see above).

The other text to be referred to is a new version of the Sumerian poem “The Death of Gilgamesh” published and studied by A. Cavigneaux and F. Al-Rawi. The poem begins with introducing Gilgamesh who is lying on his death bed (ll. 1-19). After a lacuna, Gilgamesh saw a vision, in which the gods, after reviewing his heroic career, suggest that despite his divine birth he must die and descend to the netherworld (ll. 49-79 // 140-169). However, he shall exercise governorship of the netherworld (šagina kur.ra hé.ak.e) in that there “he will pass judgment and render verdicts” (ll. 81f. // 171f.). So, Gilgamesh does not have to descend to the netherworld in anger (ša zú/zu.ké da) (l.100//190). The text then refers to ki.si.ga:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{igi.du ki.si.ga a.n[un.na]} & \quad (l. 103 \text{ in tablet } M^1) \\
\text{igi.du ki.si.ga } &\text{ }^d\text{a.nun.na }^d\text{dingir } ^d\text{g}[\text{al.gal }] & \quad (l. 193 \text{ in tablet } M^1) \\
\text{[igi.d]}u.\text{un } &\text{ki.sig }^d\text{a.nun.}^d\text{ke},.\text{ne dingir } ^d\text{gal.gal.ne KU.ru.na.b[a'] } & \quad (l. 193 \text{ in tablet } M^2)
\end{align*}
\]

Although the last phrase KU.ru.na.b[a'] remains inexplicable, Gilgamesh is expected here to bring ki.si.ga for Anunna, “great gods” of the netherworld. As Cavigneaux and Al-Rawi point out, ki.si.ga means nothing here but “objets nécessaires pour kispu ša šēri” that were buried together with a dead body (ša šēri must be emended to ina šēri). It includes not only commodities that the dead person is supposed to need on the way to the netherworld, but also articles that he should give as his presents to the netherworld deities. The poem indeed later depicts in ll. 268-287 the scene in which Gilgamesh brings his presents (igi.du,kadra.bi) to the deities of the netherworld including different kinds of dead priests, as Ur-Namma does in another Sumerian poem “The Death of Ur-Namma.”
IV. kispu(m) in the Old Babylonian Period

Regarding kispu(m) in Mari texts, I just mention three relevant articles in the note, because this is a topic that has been discussed by other scholars. Two Old Babylonian letters in which kispu(m) appears are touched upon instead. According to the first one, a certain Marduk-nāšir sent two young persons to a manager of his field so that the manager quickly may send to Babylon some amount of barley yielded from the field together with barley of Huzūlu. The barley should be needed for “care of the dead” as the last line of the letter shows: ki-ma ti-du-ú ki.sî.ga ū-ta-ak-ki-ba-am “As you know, (the day for) care of the dead has drawn near” (l. 24). F. R. Kraus put ki.sî.ga instead of ki.sî.ga in the transliteration. Based on his translation “Totenopfer,” ki.sî.ga is assumed to be a mistaken for ki.sî.ga (=kispu(m)). Because barley is harvested in early summer, kispu(m) “care for the dead” with barley offerings in the letter should have been carried out in the month of Abu. It is well known that kispum in the month of Abu was practiced in the Old Babylonian period, which tradition might date back to the Ur III period.

More interesting is the second letter, which was sent by Hammurabi, king of Babylon, to Sin-iddinam, one of the governors under Hammurabi. Hammurabi quotes a petition of the man called Sin-uselli that his son who disappeared eight years ago is forced to stay in Ik-bū in a hidden way. The man says in the first half of the petition: 1géštu.lal (=Sukkukum) ma-ri iš-tu mu.8.kam īh-li-gà-an-ni-ma ba-al-ṭā-us-sū ū-ul i-de-e-ma ki-ma mi-tim ki-is-pa-am ak-ta-as-si-ip-sum “My son Sukkukum disappeared from me eight years ago and I did not know whether he was still alive and I kept performing care of the dead as if he were dead.” Although it is not clarified in the petition where and how often the petitioner performed kispu(m) for his supposedly dead son, we can imagine that the name of his son was invoked together with other deceased family members on the monthly occasion of the ancestral cult. This is the first evidence that a father took care of his dead, in this case supposedly dead, son.

A prayer text (CBS 473) published by C. Wilcke should be taken into account in this respect, even though the term kispu(m) is not used in the text. The part in question reads (ll. 1-5):

[^en].zu (/[^en].zu) dingir ša-me-e ū er-še-tim at-ta
[a-na k]i-im-ti ^en.zu-na-ši-ir dumu sig-An-nu-ni-tum
[i-na še']-ri-im me-e a-na-aq-qī-kum ki-im-ti ^en.zu-na-ši-ir dumu sig-An-nu-ni-tum uš-še-ra-am-ma’ninda’šu li-κu-lu ū me-e-šu li-iš-tu-ū
Peace for the Dead, or kispu(m) Again

“[Sî]n ([Nina]zu) , you, god of the heavens and the earth, [for] the family of Sîn-nâṣir, son of Ipqi-Annunītum, I pour water for you [in the mor]ning. Release the family of Sîn-nâṣir, son of Ipqi-Annunītum, so that they may eat his bread and drink his water.”

This is a prayer to god Sîn (or Ninazu) for releasing kimtu (“the family”) of Sîn-nâṣir so that “his family” may eat bread and drink water.” As Wilcke correctly comments on this text, kimtu (“the family” means here the ancestors of Sîn-nâṣir (etemmē kimtīm). We will find the same usage of “the family” (im.ri.a=kimtu) further in a Kassite material (see below). What is remarkable in this text is “release” of the ancestors: *kimti Sîn-nâṣir mār Ipqi-Annunītum uššeram “release the ‘family’ of Sîn-nâṣir, son of Ipqi-Annunītum.” F. R. Kraus notes: “Entsprechend der bekannten Einstellung der Babylonier zu Toten kann mit der erbetenen ‘Freilassung’ der Toten hier nur eine befristete, eben ein (spezieller) Urlaub, gemeint sein.”

I understand “Urlaub” here as an occasion in which the family spirit(s) is (are) released for a while in order to ascend from the netherworld and enjoy “the ancestral festival” (see below).

V. *isin abim

A late Old Babylonian gallbladder omen text that I am preparing to publish together with other omen tablets should be mentioned here. Although the term kispum is not be used in the text, the apodosis is very much suggestive with regards to the theme. I quote ll. 22-28 of the text:

22: šum-ma re-ú-um pè-še-et-ma i-na qa-aq-qa-di-šu pu-šū
23: ù ši-lu na-di a-wi-lu i-nu-ma a-bu-um i-lu-ú-ni
24: i-na ú-um i-šs'-in a-bi-im it-ti a-wi-il-tim
25: i-na ma-har a-bi-im it-ti-il-ma qa-aq-as-su
26: i-na na-di-im ša ma-har a-bi-im iš-ku-un
27: ù a-bu-um i-na har-ra-ni-šu-nu i-le-eq'-qū-ú-šu
28: a-wi-lu-um šu-ú i-ma-at

If the “shepherd” (of the gallbladder) is white, and a white patch and a hole are laid on his head, then, in case that a man, when the ancestors come up (from the netherworld) on the day of the ancestor’s festival, lies down with a woman in the presence of the ancestors and places his “head” in the “water skin” in the presence of the ancestors, the ancestors shall take him away on their way. The man will die.

The text suggests that “the ancestral festival” (isin abim) is the day on which the ancestors ascend (a-bu-um i-lu-ú-ni) from the netherworld obviously in order to receive kispum-offerings. On this day sexual intercourse should be avoided “in the presence of the ancestors.” “To place his head in the water skin” should not be understood literally, but as a euphemism for sexual intercourse. Despite the singular form abum “father” must be regarded in a collective sense as the ancestors, or spirits of the family, as the plural form of the verb shows (ll. 23 and 27). We have a more or less parallel expression in a Mari text: a-na ki-is-pî-im [śl]a ab-hê-e “for kispum of the ancestors.”27 In all events, we have here the first clear evidence that the ancestors come up on the earth at the ancestral festival (isin abim), which can be another expression of kispum and connected with “release of the family (spirits)” in the text mentioned above (CBS 473). The ancestral festival might have been held in the month of Abu.

VI. kispu(m) in the Kassite Period

From the Kassite period we have now five new references to kispu in the delivery lists published and studied by L. Sassmannshausen as text nos. 173 (UM 29-16-110, barley flour), 195 (UM 29-16-133, beer), 215 (CBS 8682, beer), 266 (UM 29-16-83, beer), and 284 (CBS 10791, oil).28 Two things should be pointed out with regard to the kispu custom in the Kassite time. First, kispu ginû “regular offerings for the dead.” No. 173, ll. 2f. read:

\[
\begin{align*}
2 & \text{PI ki-is-pu gi-nu-ú} \\
1 & \text{bán 1 sîla kimin ud.29.kam}
\end{align*}
\]

“2 pars/šîktu (about 120 l of barley flour) for regular offerings for the dead,
1 sîtu and 1 qû (about 11 l of barley flour) for the same on the 29th day.”

The text is almost equivalent to another monthly delivery list of barley flour from the same year (the 2nd year of Kudur-Enlil), HS 126, 2f.:

\[
\begin{align*}
2 & \text{PI ki-is-pu gi-nu-ú} \\
1 & \text{(bán) 2 sîla kimin ud.21.kam.29}
\end{align*}
\]
Based on the fact that the amount of flour for kispu ginnû is almost ten times as much as that for kispu on the 29th in the first and on the 21st in the second text, and in consideration of both days as special cases, kispu ginnû might mean “the daily offerings for the dead.” We already know a Kassite delivery list which shows that an article, which is not identified because of damages of the text, was delivered for kispu from the 1st to 30th or 29th of the month.30

Second, é.im.ri.a (=bit kimti “the family house”) in no. 284, l. 21: 1 bán i.ba é ü ki.si.ga é.im.ri.a “1 sātu of oil delivery for the house and for kispu of the family house.” Sassmannshausen remarks on “the family house”: “Der Beleg wirft die Frage nach der Funktion des Familienhauses auf. Es kann sich hier kaum um das Wohnhaus einer Familie handeln.”31 I would like to make an addition to this remark, namely that “the family” here means “ancestors of the family” as in the Old Babylonian prayer cited above. If so, “the family house” (é.im.ri.a) should be taken for “the family grave.” It is not unusual that the word “house”(é =bitu) is used for the grave or mausoleum especially in the texts of the first millennium.32

The related materials from the Middle Euphrate region of the second half of the Late Bronze age are left out here, because scholars like K. van der Toorn, W. T. Pitard and B. B. Schmidt have discussed them in detail.33

VII. kispu(m) in a Curse Formula

From materials of the first millennium BCE, the Neo-Assyrian tomb inscriptions published by A. Fadhil in BagM 21 should be touched on lightly.34 The term kispu appears in the cursing formula of two parallel texts (ll. 3-4 in A // ll. 8-11 in B): šā ṛa-ra-nu šu-a-tū ta āš-rī-šā i-de-ku-ū gidim-šu it-ti gidimmeš ki-is-pa ul i-ma-har “whoever removes this coffin from its site, his spirit shall not receive care of the dead together with the spirits.” This formula reminds me of a passage of Ashurbanipal’s inscription in which he says that he exposed the grave of the Elamite kings and deprived them of kispu and water pouring.35 Fadhil published one more tomb inscription, IM 125000, which describes a similar curse without using the term kispu (ll. 11-17): šā ṛaššiš ša ki.mah šu-a-tū sad-ū e-le-nu ina šu-ru-du ṛa-e-te-ma-šā ina šu-me-e ka-ma-te li-i-r-pu-du šap-lan nu ina ki-ti ta-na qa me-e kaš.sag ṛaššiš ša ša a-ti ta-kal-li-mu la i-ma-har “Whoever opens this seal of the grave, above in the sun light his spirit shall roam outside in thirst, beneath in the netherworld he shall not receive pouring water, excellent beer, wine, upuntu-flour, (and) the takallimu-offerings together with Anunnaku.”36 It is remarkable that the text mentions takallimu, a varied form of taklimu (“Schauopfer” in AHw 1307b, “a food offering” in CAD
T 81b), because, as far as I know, taklimu is not used in such a context. But it should be noted that the term is derived from the same root as taklimtu ("Aufbahrung im Totenkult" in AHw 1307b, “display (of the body before burial)” in CAD T 80a-b). The latter was an essential part of the funerary ceremony as attested in some Neo-Assyrian as well as ritual texts.\textsuperscript{37}

The texts mentioned here with respect to the cult of the dead show how much people of Ancient Mesopotamia were concerned about peaceful afterlife and how horrible it was for them not to be buried or cared for after burial in an appropriate way. Peace for the dead was bound up with peace of the living.

Postscript:
During my proof-reading, Dr. D. Shibata has drawn my attention to new references of kispu in the texts of the First Sealand Dynasty, namely S. Dalley, Babylonian Tablets from the First Sealand Dynasty in the Schøn Collection, CUSAS 9, Bethesda: CDL Press, 2009, nos. 100 (l. 10) and 417 (l. 4).

\textbf{Abbreviations}

The abbreviations used in this paper follow the system of the Cuneiform Digital Library Initiative (http://cdli.ucla.edu/wiki/doku.php/abbreviations_for_assyriology).

\textbf{Notes}

1 A. Tsukimoto, Untersuchungen zur Totenpflege (kispu(m)) im alten Mesopotamien, AOAT 216, Kevelaer: Butzon and Becker/Neukirchen-Vluyn: NeukirchenerVerlag, 1985.
4 \textit{Ibid.}, 196 with n. 934.
5 \textit{Ibid.}, 64f.
6 Tsukimoto, \textit{op. cit.}, 59.
9 According to MSL V 23, 194f., the evil day (u₄,hul,gál)“ falls on the 30th day.
10 Tsukimoto, \textit{op. cit.}, 47f., 57ff.
12 Alster, \textit{op. cit.}, 60. See also A. Cavigneaux and F. N. H. Al-Rawi, Gilgamesh et sa mort: Textes de Tell Haddad VI avec appendice sur les textes funéraires sumériens, Groningen: Styx, 2000, 74f.
14 \textit{For l. 82 // 172 see “The Death of Ur-Namma” l. 144: e.ne di kur.ra i.ku₄,dé ka.aš kur.ra i.bar.re “He (=Gilgamesh) passes judgment of the netherworld, he renders verdicts of the netherworld.”}
Peace for the Dead, or kispu(m) Again

15 Cavigneaux and Al-Rawi translate the line “(Va) en tête au kispu, (le repas funèbre) offert aux Anunna, en présence des grands dieux.” (Cavigneaux and Al-Rawi, op. cit., 57). It seems to me, however, that dingir gaTgal.ne is an apposition to Anunna, as in Akkadian incantations to Anunnaku the case is (Anunna dingir guemgal guemgal).

16 Cavigneaux and Al-Rawi, op. cit., 46.

17 The text is based on tablet N³, ll. 8-28. Ibid., 22f.

21 Tsukimoto, op. cit., 48-51.

22 Sallaberger, op. cit., 205-207.

26 The tablet is owned by the Hirayama Silk Road Museum, Japan. I am very grateful to the Museum for allowing me to use it here.

27 The text is published by D. Charpin in MARI 3 (1984), 89, no. 36.

29 Tsukimoto, op. cit., 80.

30 PBS 2/2, 133, l. 2: [ x bán] 14 sīla ki-is-pu ta ud.1.kam en ud.30.kam ša inzi.a.an; l. 36: [ x bán x] sīla ki-is-pu ta ud.1.kam en ud.29.[kam ša inzi.e.kin tar]. See Tsukimoto, op. cit., 81f.

31 Sassmannshausen, op. cit., 167.

32 Tsukimoto, op. cit., 108.

35 Ashurbanipal Prism A vi 70-76.

37 See CAD T 80a-b.