The Japan Society for Studies in Journalism and Mass Communication

The world situation in 1962.

This article is in Japanese and seems to discuss various aspects of journalism and mass communication. The text includes references to specific issues and developments in the field during the year 1962. The article's title, "The world situation in 1962," suggests a comprehensive overview of the field's state at that time.

The context indicates a focus on the educational aspects of journalism, which may include methodologies, curricular developments, and the impact on practical journalism practices. The Japanese language used in the document highlights the cultural and linguistic nuances of the content, while the structured format reflects a formal approach to the subject matter.

Given the complexity and cultural specificities of the text, a detailed translation would require expertise in both Japanese and journalism studies to accurately convey the nuances and impacts discussed.
言語は区別されない。